

GUIDELINES FOR REVIEWERS

The Contested Histories Initiative is run by the Institute for Historical Justice and Reconciliation, a research centre based at EuroClio - European Association of History Educators. The initiative aims to promote public awareness and support for decision-makers to responsibly and effectively respond to controversies over historical legacies. The objective of each case study is to provide evidence of debate and controversy over tangible or intangible historical legacies and to describe the decision-making processes at work. The data collected in the case studies is input into a database and plotted using mapping software. They will form the building blocks for analysis, serving as the evidence base from which guidelines and best practices for dealing with disputed historical legacies can be developed. Cases will be published on our website (www.contestedhistories.org) and, in select instances, as part of IHJR's Occasional Paper series as a more in-depth pieces of research.

With our studies, we aim to document the 'decision-making' process that those in authority took to draw some 'lessons learned' for future decision-makers. To ensure our case studies are accurate and non-biased, we ask experts, such as yourself, to help review the research we have been compiling.

The case study is only a few pages long, and we do not ask for a formal academic written review but simply comments, either in the margin or in an email, to let us know whether we have presented the information in an accurate and non-biased way before publishing the case study. Although our limited budget does not allow us to pay for your help, we can offer a certificate of review upon request.

Thank you for your time and contribution to the Contested
Histories Initiative

In this case, we need reviewers for the case studies listed below. If you think you can help with this matter, please reach us out at contestedhistories@euroclio.eu writing the name of the case study you can review. We will send you the documents and everything you need!
